12/13/07 — FOR IMMEDIATE RELEASE

The end of the high-end, low-end divide

What does an Indian casino in Washington State have in common with a small raceway in Arlington, Virginia? The same video surveillance system.

Airship video surveillance and recording systems are designed to close the gap between low-cost, entry-level recording and complicated enterprise surveillance systems.

Airship products give best-in-class performance to organizations of any size, scaling from as few as four to thousands of cameras.

With Airship, a user with just 4 cameras (placed at entrance doors, its parking lot, and the cash register) benefits from the same real-time 30 frames per second 4CIF recording quality as a casino with thousands of cameras operating under stringent legal recording requirements.

Thanks to Airship, small businesses accustomed to low-performance recording are discovering that high-quality systems give them useful, cost-saving business intelligence as well as more prosecutable evidence.

And large organizations can save up to 76% on a surveillance system that outperforms the leading competitor, installs in less than half the time, has very manageable networking requirements, and has a footprint 1/2 the size.¹

Airship's appealing, intuitive user interface makes it easy for business owners and professional security agents to manage recording and live monitoring across a camera network of any size.

"We make enterprise performance simpler to install and easy to use, and we make it accessible to everyone. No more high-end, low-end divide," says Doug Overstreet, Airship's VP of Sales.
